

Q1 Why did the raindrops look like "new coins" to Lencho?

Ans The raindrops looked like new coins to Lencho because he was a farmer who depended on his crops for money. Good rain meant a good harvest and good earnings, so the big and small drops looked like ten-cent and five-cent silver coins to him.

Q2 What destroyed Lencho's fields? What were his feelings after the havoc?

Ans A sudden hailstorm destroyed Lencho's field leaving them white as if covered with salt, with no leaf left on the trees. After the havoc, Lencho was filled with deep sorrow, yet he did not lose hope because of his firm faith in God.

Q3 Who did Lencho have firm faith in? What did he do?

Ans Lencho had firm, unshakable faith in God, believing God sees everything and would never let him suffer.

Because of this faith, he wrote a letter to God asking for a hundred pesos, and dropped it into the mailbox at the post office.

Q4 Why did the postmaster decide to answer Lencho's letter?

Ans The postmaster was deeply moved by Lencho's unshakable faith in God and not want it to be shaken. To keep his faith alive, he collected money from his employees and his own salary, and sent it to Lencho, signing the letter simply "God".

Q5 What did Lencho hope for?

Ans Lencho hoped for a good downpour so that his ripe cornfields would yield a prosperous harvest. After the hailstorm destroyed his crop, he hoped that God would help him. He wrote a letter to God, hoping to receive a hundred pesos to feed his family and sow his field again.

Q6 What message does the story 'A letter to God' convey?

Ans The story conveys the message that faith in God can be deep and unshakeable, and that kindness and humanity still exist in people. It also shows the irony that simple, faithful people like Lencho often trust God completely while doubting fellow human beings.